sent. His method of procedure was somewhat peculiar, and somisted chiefly of purchasing stock of the farmers, giving them in payment promissory notes, signed by one Robert Johason, a wealthy farmer in the neighborhood, known by requiation at least to all the dupes. It now appears that the K. Johnson whose name really fouled the bills was a man of that name, of somewhat questionable changiter, who resided with Wadsworth. On the fraud being discovered, warrants were immediately issued for the man's arrest, but he succeeded in excepting with six or eight valuable horses he had obtained, and the whole of his household furniture, which he carried off in a couple of wagons purchased with the same kind of fraudulent notes.
